

Milwaukee Needs Ambassador, Not Congressman, at Capital

Ole Hanson, former mayor of Seattle, who will speak here at 2 p. m. Sunday, February 1, has made a study of the immigration problem and has come to certain definite conclusions which he hopes to have enacted into the law of the land. Being himself the son of Norwegian immigrants who came to this country, as he says, wearing wooden shoes, he naturally views the immigration problem with a special sympathy for the immigrant, but at the same time with a stern realization that the first party in the transaction to be considered is the United States.

Hanson realizes, as do all thinking men, that our immigration policy in the past has been woefully wrong, but he is one of the few men who have gone beyond that realization and developed a definite policy on logical and practical lines. His policy is known as selective immigration. He is in favor of immigration, but immigration by invitation.

Invitation Immigration.

"Our policy was immigration by gravitation, under which the immigrant sank to the lowest level. Now I propose that we shall have immigration by invitation, which will bring the immigrant to the highest level of American citizenship."

Under the Hanson plan no immigrant would be permitted to come to this country without a thorough physical, mental and economic examination in his own country. After arrival in this country, the immigrant would be sent to that section of the country where his experience and his calling in his own country best fits him for his tically valueless. Toy manufacturers the country over, however, are constantly on the lookout for ideas in novelties which will make such a special appeal to children.

The main competition from foreign manufacturers comes from Japan and the local company has little fear of this, in that it manufactures articles which are not made by Japanese toy manufacturers. The small cheap toy made in Japan can always undersell similar products made in America. The same thing is true of German-made toys, but manufacturers as yet have little fear that the German manufacturers will make an extensive appearance on the American market.

own development and for the development of the country.

Foreign Colonies.

This plan, Hanson believes, would do away with the menace of foreign colonies, which exist in so many places throughout the United States and which operate so effectively to prevent immigrants from learning Americanism and from becoming loyal citizens of the United States. Hanson's antipathy to foreign colonies was recently summed up in one sentence to a newspaper reporter who asked him for a statement on the reelection of Berger to congress from Milwaukee.

"Milwaukee," said the fighting mayor, "should not send a congressman to Washington; Milwaukee should send an ambassador to Washington."

Master Auto by Night School

INTEREST is being shown in the class in electricity at the night high school. Lecture, discussion and demonstration are the methods used to teach the principles involved in the study of this subject. Theory and practice are brought together here in such a way that the members of the class are obtaining some very useful and interesting information. Mr. Richard B. Ransom, the instructor, has planned the following program for the next few weeks:
